

The name Jalama originates from the Purisemeno Chumash village "Xalam" meaning bundle. Although the precise location of this indigenous Canalino people's village site is lost to history, its position near Point Concepcion is inferred from journals and artifacts including a Spanish Mission period wine fermenter and an ancient, south-facing olive grove believed to be the second-oldest in California.

"This Syrah is a blend from several selected vineyards on the Central Coast. Dark fruit again on the nose, with boysenberry and dark cherry prominent and some more pure fruit flavors in the mix as well. This Syrah is balanced and well-knit together at this point. It has a hard core of fruit that's not going away anytime soon, but it's only showing you what's on the surface right now, which makes it a great candidate for buying a few bottles for aging in your cellar.
